THE THRILL LIVES ON: After a 15-Year Winning Streak, Hugh Wilder Still Enjoyed Victory

Imagine breaking a world record: the thrill, the accomplishment, the glory of being the best at whatever it is you do. Now, imagine having to do that each day for a career on the races. That’s what Hugh Wilder has been doing for the past 15 years, and he’s still thriving.

“ Competing,” he says, “is what keeps me going. It’s a way to keep yourself on top, to keep improving.”

After finishing with the world records began in 1992, Wilder retired from full-time competition in 1997. He continued to swim in the ocean and in lakes, but for the past 15 years, he has swum at a higher level than he did in the ocean. “I’ve always been a competitive swimmer, and that’s what keeps me going,” he says.

Wilder says his philosophy on life is simple: “I swim at a higher level now than I did in the ocean.”

“I never thought I’d be able to swim at that level again,” he says. “But when I got back into it, I realized I could do it. It’s been a great experience.”

Now that he’s a star, however, Wilder doesn’t plan on falling. He continues to compete against the best swimmers in his age group and, yet again, he’s breaking records.

Guiding Light: Lindsey Barr Provides Hope in the Darkness of Substance Abuse

Lindsey Barr, a 23-year-old counselor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, has been working with students on the issue of substance abuse for the past six years. Barr is responsible for recognizing potentially dangerous situations and maintaining campus safety.

“I think our role is to promote wellness and alternatives to alcohol and substance abuse,” Barr says. “We can handle it from there.”

“We just need to get them through the door,” she says. “It’s not just the students’, not just the faculty’s. Everyone is responsible for recognizing potentially dangerous situations and maintaining our safety – to better their college experience and the campus environment.”

MARKETING MIX

The Integrated Marketing and Communications task force worked with the campus community to develop a comprehensive review of existing and new research, the brand identity will help everyone on campus effectively communicate and showcase the College as a first-class, modern university.
